

Man Tries to Make a Clean Getaway with a Street Sweeper

Summary: An Oregon man takes a street sweeper for a ride as the police chased him for 10 miles through town.

You would think that driving a street sweeper would result in some cleaning getting done but that was not the case in Oregon. Tyler Haguewood, 33, stole a sweeper Sunday morning, taking police on a 10-mile chase.

The police claim that Haguewood climbed into the Isuzu street sweeper at 3:45 AM when the driver had just exited the running vehicle “to use a handheld blower in order to clean an area where the street-sweeper could not reach.”

Once police in Hillsboro learned of the theft, it didn’t take long to locate the vehicle on the deserted early morning streets. “Officers activated their overhead emergency lights. The street-sweeper failed to yield,” according to police. The street sweeper reached speeds of 65 mph over the 10-mile chase before being taken down with spike strips deployed by Washington County Sheriff’s Office deputies.

Haguewood was taken into custody without incident. He was charged with several counts ranging from auto theft to attempting to elude police. Haguewood will also face a parole violation charge connected to a prior aggravated harassment conviction.

He is being held in the Washington County jail.

Do you think Haguewood just wanted to see what it was like to drive a street sweeper? Tell us what kind of work vehicle you have always wanted to drive in the comments below.

To learn more about people that have stolen vehicles, read these articles:

- Dentures Solve Mystery of Stolen Truck
- Greyhound Bus Stolen for Trip to Christmas Party
- Attorney’s Sports Car Stolen From Driveway

Photo: commons.wikimedia.org