

John Ring, Former NLRB Chairman, Returns to Morgan Lewis Law Firm

Morgan, Lewis & Bockius, a well-established law firm based in the United States, has recently announced the rehiring of John Ring as a partner for its U.S. Labor and Management Relations Practice. Ring was previously the Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB), an independent federal agency responsible for overseeing union elections and enforcing unfair labor practices, from 2018 until January 2021. He was appointed to this position by former President Donald Trump and continued serving as a board member until December 2022.

John Ring will be stationed in Washington, D.C., and will play a vital role in providing legal guidance to employers on various labor-related strategies, collective bargaining, and workforce restructuring. Before his five-year stint with the NLRB, Ring spent close to 30 years as a partner at Morgan, Lewis & Bockius.

The addition of John Ring to the firm's partnership comes at a crucial time as employers face significant workplace issues that the NLRB is expected to address differences in the coming years. Philip Miscimarra, another former Chairman of the NLRB who is now a partner at Morgan, Lewis & Bockius, stated that Ring's addition to the firm would help guide clients through these changes.

Philip Miscimarra is among the other NLRB alumni already partners at Morgan, Lewis & Bockius. The firm's experience and expertise in the labor and management relations field, combined with its partners' experience and knowledge, provide a comprehensive solution for employers looking for legal guidance.

The current Chairman of the NLRB is Lauren McFerran, appointed by President Joe Biden in January 2021. The NLRB plays a critical role in maintaining the balance between the rights of workers and employers, and the appointment of experienced individuals like John Ring to the firm's partnership is a testament to the firm's commitment to providing the best possible legal solutions to its clients.

In conclusion, the rehiring of John Ring as a partner at Morgan, Lewis & Bockius is a significant development in U.S. labor and management relations. His extensive experience and knowledge of the NLRB and its operations will provide valuable insights to employers seeking legal guidance in this field. The firm's partnership with experienced individuals like John Ring and Philip Miscimarra, along with its expertise in the field, makes it an ideal destination for employers looking for comprehensive legal solutions.
