How the Ranking Is Compiled

The Princeton Review bases the “Most Diverse Faculty” list on institutional demographic data and student ratings of their perception of faculty diversity, published as part of its annual “Best Law Schools” project. The 2025 lists were released July 22, 2025 and cover 14 categories; “Most Diverse Faculty” named Hawai’i at Mānoa #1. Princeton Review+1

Key Takeaways for Applicants

- Regional standouts: Public institutions in California (UC Davis, UCLA, UC Irvine) and mission-driven schools like CUNY and UDC appear alongside HBCU leader Southern University Law Center, signaling multiple pathways to study with diverse professors. Princeton Review
- Student experience matters: Because student surveys factor into the list, the ranking captures not only headcount but also how inclusive the classroom feels to learners. Princeton Review
- Complementary context: Independent reporting shows U.S. law faculties are more racially and gender diverse than ever, though gaps persist—use rankings as a starting point, then review each school’s latest data. Inside Higher Ed

Why Faculty Diversity Matters in Legal Education

- Better preparation for practice: Exposure to a range of scholarly and professional viewpoints improves analysis of cases involving race, gender, class, disability, and cross-cultural issues.
- Mentorship and networks: Students often find mentors whose backgrounds or research areas mirror their own aspirations, improving bar passage, clerkship pursuit, and job search confidence.
- Community credibility: Clinics and public-interest programs serving diverse clients benefit from faculty who bring varied lived experiences and language skills into the classroom and courtroom.

How to Use This List in Your Law School Search

1. Read each school’s faculty bios (practice backgrounds, clinics, journals).
2. Ask about hiring and retention: How is the school investing in future faculty diversity?
3. Sit in on a class (virtual or in-person) to gauge classroom dynamics.
4. Compare with other indicators like overall student-body diversity and “Greatest Resources for Minority Students” to build a complete picture. Princeton Review

Conclusion

The 2025 “Most Diverse Faculty” list underscores growing momentum—and meaningful differences—across law schools. If learning from a faculty that reflects a broad range of identities and perspectives is a priority, the schools above are a strong place to begin deeper research. Princeton Review
